Most of the processes that affect people's lives take place at the local level, although until recently this area had hardly been taken into account when designing, planning and managing public action. Local empowerment allows to 'create' effective solutions to the problems and difficulties faced by a local community, and contributes to promoting local potentialities to achieve an 'optimal' situation. This only happens from a framework of reflection and strategic action that includes a rigorous analysis of its present situation and the strict characterization of the territorial baseline, the determination of a preferred and viable model of territory for the future, and the identification and implementation of the strategies that will make it possible to achieve this model.
